Asset management strategy

With the Russia-Ukraine conflict now past its 100th day, escalating sanctions on Moscow have translated into an embargo on nearly 90% of Russian exports, fuelling quickening inflation in the eurozone. Moreover, the ECB is standing by its scenario of continued interest rate hikes to combat inflation nearing 8%, with oil prices having peaked at the end of May (Brent: $122 a barrel) on the back of the European Commission's announcement that it would ban imports of Russian crude in the next six months.

Markets lost ground last month, with the Stoxx 600 Europe losing 0.9% and the Act4 Positive Economy fund losing 1.03%. The energy sector gained over 11% in the month, while financials, and particularly banking, benefited from continued rate hike scenarios. Consumer staples lost nearly 4% as a result of cost inflation, tech was hit by rising interest rates and healthcare was adversely affected by disappointing company news in the sector. The fund, which is underexposed to these sectors, benefited from a positive allocation effect. Conversely, the fund is overweight industrials, which underperformed the market. Performance in the sector was a mixed bag, with growth stocks like Nibe and Tomra Systems penalised by the interest rate environment and positions like Alfen (newly added, up 13%), Alstom (up 20%), Nexans (up 8.3%) and Spie all making positive contributions. Dutch energy transition player Alfen has benefited from penetration of the electric vehicles segment, growth in renewable energy generation and increasingly decentralised production requiring grid connection and storage solutions. Its growth outlook is underpinned by these trends as well as by the company's international expansion. Alstom gained ground after finally issuing a release that was reassuring on a number of fronts: very high expectations on cash flow were met and the outlook for 2023 is positive. New orders and margins look healthy, with Bombardier Transport synergies in 2026 likely to come in around €475-500 million. Construction services company Spie held an Investor Day at which it confirmed its medium-term goals, highlighting a jam-packed order book boosted by the firm's energy-transition-related growth plan and decarbonation projects in France and Germany. Spie is targeting 4% organic growth. For 2022, organic growth should come in at 3%, with M&A deals adding €250 million to sales and the margin set to expand.

Transactions in the month involved adding to existing positions to reduce the high proportion of cash (almost 10%).
